- The rand started the week looking quite good but that soon changed as we tracked the TRY blow for blow through the day
- TRY started the day looking good after the elections in the mid 4.50's but gradually returned to the pre elections levels around the 4.70 area and the Rand basically tracked this move gradually shifting weaker from a mid-13.40 open to weaken towards the early 13.60 area touching 13.6325 in early NYK , late local session. Through the New York session the focus returned back to the dollar which lost more ground across the board on continued trade war fears with the EUR trading back above the 1.1700 level. This helped the rand recover somewhat and this morning we are looking slightly better around the 12.52/54 area.
- Not much on the horizon for today so focus will no doubt remain on the trade situation although there seems to be some rumblings in German political circles over migration which could put some pressure on the EUR and will be worth keeping an eye on. A few central bank speakers from ECB, BOE and the Fed through the day thrown in with local non-farm payrolls then US consumer confidence and Richmond Fed manufacturing later this afternoon.
- Hard to say where the rand is going to take its lead from today but TRY seems to have stabilised just under the 4.70 level for now so maybe today could be better to keep an eye on general dollar movements.
- Today's expected range 13.3500-13.6500

Foreign flows

- Foreign equity and bond flows remain downbeat, with net outflows for the YTD at R30.6 billion. While this has been predominantly driven by a sharp sell-off in bonds, equities have not come out unscathed, with inflows dropping from a YTD peak of R35 billion in early May, to the current R6.6 billion. Bond outflows stand at R37 billion this year.
- Last week alone, global risk-off sentiment persisted, with outflows of R14.1 billion, driven by bond sales. Uncertainty over global trade and trade wars stemming from the US, followed by a still hawkish Fed and strong dollar, sentiment towards EM and risk assets have soured over the past two months. While uncertainty still dominates, we could see a short-term reprieve given the extended sell-off if geopolitical tensions calm.
